

CONTINUITY AND CHANGE: Four Indonesian Cabinets Since October 1, 1965, with scattered data on their members' organizational and ethnic affiliations, age and place of birth.

(Prepared by the Editors)

One partial measure of the shifts in political power in Indonesia since the abortive coup of October 1 is the altered composition of the official political elite -- those persons holding ministerial rank. The changes in this official elite amply demonstrate the post-coup gravitation of political power -- formal as well as informal -- to a new clustering of factions dominated principally by the Indonesian army under General Suharto. At the same time, a study of these changes also suggests both the gradual pace of this political shift and its limits. It is noteworthy, for example, that over 20 persons holding a ministerial-level position on October 1 still held such a position in the Ampera Cabinet formed some ten months later on July 28.

In an effort to highlight these themes of continuity and change in the official elite, the editors have tried to present something more than a mere catalogue of the numerous alterations in the elite. Essentially what is given below are four cabinet lists -- each representing a somewhat blurred, still photograph of the formal distribution of power in Indonesia at four key junctures in the dynamic process of developing a new political equilibrium.

The first list serves as a benchmark. It shows the official elite of what is now known as the "Old Order" -- the Guided Democracy of President Sukarno -- in its fullest and final formal incarnation on the eve of the coup. The very title of this cabinet -- Dwikora⁽¹⁾ -- nicely symbolizes the typical Guided Democracy priority on a militantly nationalist foreign policy best known for its "confrontation" with Malaysia. More importantly, the organizational affiliations of the Dwikora members (see the first column to the right of each minister's name) reflect Sukarno's effort to institutionalize his preference for a Nasakom government -- a coalition government integrating representatives of Indonesia's three dominant political orientations of nationalism, religion and communism. Indications that Sukarno had, in fact, not progressed very far with the Nasakomization of the government are also apparent. Not only was the PKI limited to just one ministerial post with portfolio, but the anti-communist army leadership maintained their hold on a plethora of such posts. Finally, with regard to ethnic origin (see the second column to the right of each minister's name) the Dwikora Cabinet possessed a heavily Javanese aspect. The proportion of Javanese in the Cabinet considerably exceeded the approximately 45:55 ratio of Javanese to non-Javanese in the population as a whole.

(1) Dwikora is the Indonesian abbreviation for the two commands issued by President Sukarno in May 1964 to intensify the execution of the policy of "Crush Malaysia."

With the Dwikora Cabinet of October 1 as a benchmark the reshuffle of the Dwikora Cabinet on February 24 becomes more comprehensible. In retrospect it appears as a last, perhaps inevitably abortive, attempt by Sukarno to forestall the further erosion of his powers and the reversal of his Nasakom and confrontation policies. Although initially successful in ousting General Nasution as Defense Minister, Sukarno in the end achieved only the acceleration of the very tendencies he had hoped to check. Within two weeks the army, together with its demonstrative student allies, forced Sukarno to transfer effective power to General Suharto. There quickly followed an order for the arrest of 15 of Sukarno's closest allies, including Dr. Subandrio.

Coming in the wake of these signal Sukarno defeats, it is not surprising that the next reshuffle of the Dwikora Cabinet (see below p. 200) marked the transition to what is now termed the "New Order." The character of the "New Order" finds much fuller expression, however, with the inauguration of the Ampera Cabinet on July 28 (see below p. 208) just three weeks after the MPRS had confirmed Sukarno's earlier transfer of power to Suharto on March 11. In almost every respect the Ampera Cabinet offers a contrast -- at least in degree, if not in kind -- with the pre-coup Dwikora Cabinet as constituted on October 1. Despite the inclusion of many holdovers from the ranks of the Dwikora Cabinet, this first largely army-selected cabinet represented a new mood in Djakarta politics. The very name Ampera -- The Message of the People's Suffering⁽²⁾ -- testified to the sharp reversal of Sukarno's priorities in favor of concentration on rehabilitating Indonesia's economy. Consistent with this new concern, the cabinet had a technocratic appearance thanks to the prevalence of academic degrees among the new ministers -- including several of the military officers. Even more marked, however, was the contrast in political coloration with the Dwikora Cabinet of ten months before. With the decimation of the PKI and all of its affiliate organizations, the "New Order" had guaranteed that for the short term there would be no revival of even the idea of a Nasakom regime as envisioned by Sukarno. While retaining the strong Javanese cast of its predecessor, the "New Order" had unmistakably abandoned the leftist mystique of Sukarno's Guided Democracy. For the moment at least a more conservative and pragmatic attitude characterized the official political elite of Indonesia.

* * * * *

To facilitate understanding of politically significant continuities and changes the editors have employed several devices in compiling the four cabinet lists discussed above. First, the names of individuals in any of the first three of the lists who are destined to lose ministerial rank in a succeeding list are underlined.

(2) AMPERA is the Indonesian abbreviation coined by President Sukarno to demonstrate Guided Democracy's concern with the people's welfare.

Second, individuals in any of the last three lists who have appeared in an earlier list receive one asterisk to the left of their name for each instance of such durability. For example, K. H. Idham Chalid who has served in all four cabinets -- albeit in different posts -- has three asterisks next to his name in the Ampera Cabinet listing.

Third, the order in which the various ministries or departments are listed follows roughly the scheme initiated with the Ampera Cabinet. This scheme groups the ministries functionally into five major areas -- defense and security, political affairs, people's welfare, economics and finance, and industry and development. In the case of the Ampera Cabinet listing this scheme encompasses all persons of ministerial rank. In the earlier cabinets, however, persons serving as advisor to the President or as heads of various governmental agencies -- not to mention the chairmen of the top legislative bodies -- were accorded ministerial rank. All such ministers have been placed at the end of the first three cabinet listings.⁽³⁾

Adoption of a common scheme of organization for the four cabinet lists does, of course, entail considerable re-arrangement of the official listings of the Dwikora Cabinet and the February 24 and March 30 reshuffles. Nevertheless, such rearrangement seems justified both because the Dwikora sequence had no apparent functional rationale and because comparison with the current Ampera Cabinet is greatly facilitated by use of the common scheme. Moreover, the official listing of the Dwikora Cabinet as constituted on October 1, 1965 is already available to readers of Indonesia in Susan Finch and Daniel Lev, Republic of Indonesia Cabinets 1945-1965 (Cornell Modern Indonesia Project: Interim Report Series, 1965), Appendix, pp. 6-14. The same source provides the composition of the Dwikora Cabinet at the time of its inauguration on September 2, 1966.

Fourth, in the case of the Ampera Cabinet list the editors have included officials designated secretary-general and director-general. Although not formally regarded as persons of ministerial rank, the functions of these officials were often held by ministers or deputy ministers in the three preceding lists. Accordingly it seemed reasonable to consider them as having ministerial rank for purposes of comparison with the earlier Dwikora lists.⁽⁴⁾ Fifth, the relatively few ministerial changes which occurred in the periods between the four cabinet lists have been listed following each of the first three.

(3) Such posts were stripped of ministerial status at the time of the installation of the Ampera Cabinet.

(4) It should also be noted that these officials were installed in early August some days after the formal installation of the ministers of the Ampera Cabinet on July 28.

Sixth, the primary organizational affiliation and the ethnic origin of each minister has been indicated in the two columns to the right of his name. Where an individual has no formal party identification, the appropriate space has been left blank. Where a person is strongly identified with an organization, but not an official member, a single parenthesis has been placed around the organizational designation. If a minister is -- at the time of a given list -- a member of a banned or disbanded organization, a bracket has been placed around the organizational designation. Question marks indicate those many instances where the editors do not know an organizational or ethnic affiliation. It is the hope of the editors that this public confession of ignorance will inspire readers of Indonesia to offer additions, corrections, and comment.

Finally, to aid analysis an alphabetical index of all persons appearing in the four lists is found on pp. 213-222. Apart from repeating the organizational and ethnic data given in the cabinet lists, this index also contains -- where known -- the place and date of birth of each minister. The numbers 1, 2, 3 and 4 indicate in which of the four cabinets a given minister served.
