

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

Research travel for my dissertation was funded by an Overseas Research Travel Grant from the Mario Einaudi Center for International Studies, a Domestic Research Travel Grant from the Cornell Graduate School, and a Research-in-Residence Fellowship at the Lewis Walpole Library (Yale University).

I am especially grateful to the chair of my committee, Neal Zaslaw, for his expert guidance, which resulted in improvements both minor and immense, and for the generosity with which he offered his wisdom, time, and encouragement. He was and is a superlative role model both professionally and personally. Judith Peraino, Annette Richards, and James Webster made up the rest of what was often described as an “eclectic” group of advisors -- and indeed each brought a unique perspective that helped shape my work in vital ways. I offer my sincerest thanks to all of my committee members for their suggestions and questions, their written comments, their own examples of writing, teaching, and scholarship, and perhaps above all, for their general support throughout my graduate career.

Portions of my dissertation were presented at conferences of Feminist Theory and Music, the Midwest-American Society for Eighteenth-Century Studies, the International Society for Eighteenth-Century Studies, and the Cornell Music Department Colloquium Series; audience members’ questions at each of these occasions refined my thinking and led to new ideas and resources. Peter Gilgen, Richard Leppert, and Bill Weber provided meaningful advice in the earliest stages of this project, as did Mel Piehl on an intermediate draft. Suzanne Eggleston Lovejoy at the Yale Music Library, and Joan Sussler and Margaret Powell at the Lewis Walpole Library provided practical assistance and suggestions, and made my residency in Farmington a very pleasurable one. Brian Brooks and Paul O'Connell warmly welcomed and oriented me to a scholar's life in London; Paul also obtained missing photocopies after I left, as did Rebecca Plack. Rebecca, a soprano, and fortepianist Blaise Bryski taped a number of previously unrecorded canzonet excerpts for use in my presentations; hearing their painstaking and compelling renderings had the additional effect of rekindling my enthusiasm for the subject. Ann Tillman assisted with crucial administrative matters while I was away from campus. As the project neared completion, and I needed to devote my two-week Spring Break to intensive writing, Helen O'Connell made sure I still had a vacation by stepping in with household assistance and childcare. Likewise, a visit from Katherine Day converted what would have been a stretch of Spartan days in London into a delightful holiday of sorts, and she even forwent several hours of sightseeing in order to copy canzonet texts in the British Library.

The completion of this dissertation was delayed by a pregnancy complication that left me, and then my newborn son, hospitalized for a combined total of seventeen weeks. I hope I have, in other formats, managed to provide some inkling of my gratitude to the many people who helped my family survive this period, not to mention experience a happy outcome. Here I must limit myself to thanking those who directly enabled the continuation of my work on this project. My doctor, Christopher Wirsing, gently queried several times about whether I might be able to accomplish something dissertation-related from my hospital bed, and responded with respect and empathy when I invariably replied that I simply couldn't concentrate. Then one day his response took the form of an extended pep talk, which encouraged me to believe that, no matter what the outcome of my current situation, my work was and would continue to be important. His timing was impeccable and I feel fortunate to have had a physician who attended to my emotional as well as physical well-being. Very shortly thereafter, Lenore Coral offered, from halfway across the country, to help me obtain materials I needed. Dorothy Bass, during some of her regular visits, and Phil Bohlman, through several emails and his own example, inspired me to keep faith that I would eventually know the dual satisfaction of contributing both personally as a parent and professionally as a musicologist. It would have been exceptionally difficult for me to resume my work after my recovery had it not been for the modest efforts I made as a result of these interactions.

Ultimately it was the unwavering love and support -- intellectual, practical, moral, spiritual -- of my husband Jeremy that was the essential element in the completion of this dissertation.

As I wrote my initial research prospectus, I experienced the death of my maternal grandmother. Her sister, my great aunt, died just days before the dissertation's completion. These two talented women shared an intense passion for music, art, language, and ideas; both had an uncanny ability to see beauty and interest in unlikely places. But like most women of their generation, they were not encouraged, as I have persistently been, to pursue their talents fully, to stretch themselves, or to expect to make a broadly-felt "public" mark with their lives. I would have loved to read their dissertations, had they had the opportunity to write them. My dissertation, then, is dedicated to their memories.
