The Changing Face of NYS: Immigrant Youth in Every Community
by Maud Easter and Dina Refki

When the number of immigrants and children of immigrants reached one-third of New York State's population by 1995, youth programs statewide began discovering they needed answers to new questions about adolescents in their community.¹

• What languages do our county’s teens speak at home?
• What cultural traditions shape the way they and their parents see adolescence?
• How does the immigration experience both strengthen and challenge these teens?

The 2000 Census shows that immigrants have settled throughout upstate and downstate New York, in rural, suburban and urban communities. Understanding the rapidly growing and geographically expanding population of immigrant families all across the state is critical to designing effective youth development programs, with the cultural and linguistic proficiencies needed to help immigrant adolescents thrive in their new communities.

New York: Becoming Global State

■ Families from over 150 countries around the world now live in NYS.
■ Immigrant families have moved to every county of NYS.
■ NYS has the second largest immigrant population in the nation.
■ More than 40% are new immigrants, having arrived since 1990.
■ Upstate counties with high proportions of new immigrants:
  • Tompkins 65%  • Albany 39%
  • Oneida 54%  • Westchester 39%
  • Onondaga 43%  • Monroe 36%

Foreign-born in NYS by Year of Entry

2 Unless otherwise noted, statistics are based on the 2000 Census and include persons counted by the Census without regard to immigration status. The term “immigrant” refers to foreign-born persons, except in specified cases in which foreign-born and children of foreign-born are combined.
NYS Immigrants: Three-fourths from Latin America, Asia and Africa

- Between 1970 and 2000, the regions of origin of immigrants in NYS changed dramatically, bringing new racial and ethnic diversity to communities statewide. This is similar to a pattern occurring across the entire United States.

Immigrant Family Challenges

Immigrant youth are impacted greatly by the migration experience and by pressures facing newcomer families, including:

- Poverty: Since 1990, poverty rates among children of immigrants have been 50% higher than those of children of US-born parents. ²

- Hunger: One-third of NYC immigrant families have difficulty affording food. ³

- Health Insurance: Immigrant children are 3 times as likely to lack health insurance as children with US-born parents. ⁴

- Immigration Status Fears: Families fear that participation in public health programs could negatively impact immigration interests. ⁵

- Environmental Dangers: Immigrant families face overcrowded housing, asthma-causing conditions, agricultural pesticides. ⁶

- Language and Cultural Barriers: Youth and their families must deal with language and cultural barriers in youth programs, schools and health care programs. ⁷

The Language Challenge

In order to communicate effectively and comfortably with immigrant teens and parents, youth programs are learning they need new language capacities, either through bilingual staff or subcontracting with bilingual immigrant community-based agencies.

- 27% of NYS children (ages 5-17) speak a language other than English at home.⁸

- Over 7% of NYS children live in linguistically isolated households (no member 14 years or older speaks English very well), thrusting large interpreting responsibilities on adolescents.

- 16 counties have more than 4,000 people living in linguistically isolated households.

- Youth programs in upstate cities like Utica, a city with over 30 languages, are discovering the value of partnerships with refugee centers and ethnic community organizations.

- Youth agencies in NYC, where over 150 languages are spoken, have developed effective programs bringing together teens whose families share the culture and language traditions of one country or region.

Spotlight on Three Different NYS Regions

NYS regions have different immigrant demographics:

Hudson Valley: Suburban immigrant growth has been higher (since 1990) than central city immigrant growth. The Hudson Valley received 122,000 new immigrants from 1990-2000. An increasing number of immigrants are making their first US home in NYC suburbs.

Rural NYS: 47,000 migrant farm workers (80% immigrants) come yearly to rural NYS, from the Finger Lakes to Long Island. They are isolated in 1,200 labor camps and often feel unwelcome in local communities. According to Cornell Migrant Program estimates, 52% of farm workers are undocumented, creating barriers to needed health and social services, due to NYS immigration status requirements.10

New York City: Since the mid-1990s, foreign-born and children of foreign-born have made up two-thirds of New York City’s population.11 By 2000, the New York City metropolitan area had become the #1 destination in the country for new immigrants.12

Youth Program Strategies

- Learn the ethnicities of immigrant families in your community by analyzing census data and/or conducting a community demographic profile.

- Identify languages spoken at home by your community’s teens by reaching out to schools and by conducting formal/informal surveys of teens.

- Partner with immigrant community-based organizations which have the language and cultural competency needed for effective communication with teens and their parents. These organizations can serve as bridges to connect you effectively with the immigrant communities - for needs assessment, cross training and collaborative programs.

- Integrate cultural and linguistic competencies into your organization by embedding competency in your organization’s mission, as well as creating strategies at all organizational levels that will help you accomplish these goals.

The next issue of PrACTice Matters will also be provided by Voices for Change: Immigrant Women & State Policy. Immigrant Youth Development: Challenges & Opportunities will analyze the implications of immigrant demographics for youth development programs. It will discuss the special assets of immigrant youth, the challenge of creating youth programs to support and develop these strengths, and useful program development strategies for work with youth, their parents and their schools.
