

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

I am indebted to more people than I can properly acknowledge. At Yale, Bill Kelly taught me to appreciate ethnography without dousing my desire to read philosophy. At Chicago, Prasenjit Duara welcomed me as a student, a teaching assistant, and a reading group member, and I am still becoming aware of all that I learned from him. At Cornell, I have been fortunate to work with the finest ensemble of people imaginable. Vivienne Shue was always encouraging and made me a more careful thinker and writer. Sherman Cochran set the highest standard of professional excellence and somehow made me believe it was within my reach. He was an inspiration in more ways than I could ever express. Dominic Boyer brought important professional tracks into view for me and showed me the way onto them. His work has also served as a valuable model to emulate. Jane Fajans has been unstintingly supportive, and it is impossible to overstate how grateful I am for her professional, intellectual, and personal generosity. Steve Sangren has simply been the greatest mentor a graduate student could ask for. Throughout, I have been energized by his intellect, influenced by his ideas, and inspired by his convictions. Steve has also been a special friend, making my debt for his mentorship that much more immeasurable.

I am also fortunate to have studied along the way with other outstanding professors, particularly David Apter, Ian Duncan, Michael Holquist, James C. Scott, and Jonathan D. Spence. My graduate experience was also improved by productive exchanges with, and insightful feedback from, a number of other faculty as well as graduate students, notably Thomas Asher, Anya Bernstein, Gardner Bovington, Robert Culp, Sara Friedman, Derek Hall, David Holmberg, Bernd Lambert, Anru Lee, Kathryn March, Jeffery Martin, Hirokazu Miyazaki, Marc Moskowitz, Viranjini Munasinghe, Yakob Rigi, Annelise Riles, Matthew Rudolph, William Schaefer, Johanna Schoss, Scott Simon, Donald Sutton, Terrence Turner, and Andrew Willford.

Many of these exchanges were a byproduct of the precious Cornell Anthropology Colloquium, which set such a formative intellectual rhythm that I cannot pass a Friday afternoon away from Ithaca without pining for a speaker and a potluck.

A Fulbright Fellowship funded one year (2000-2001) of fieldwork in Taiwan, and I wish to thank Dr. Wu Jing-jyi and the staff of the Foundation for Scholarly Exchange for their support. Language study, fieldwork, and writing were also supported by a very generous Olin Fellowship from Cornell, as well as by FLAS, C.V. Starr, Hu Shih Memorial, and Lee Teng-hui Fellowships provided by the Cornell East Asia Program, and I wish to thank Laurie Damiani for her expert administrative assistance and friendship.

In Taiwan, I was fortunate to be affiliated with the Institute of Ethnology at Academia Sinica, and I am indebted to Yeh Chuen-Rong for his hospitality, friendship, and intellectual guidance. My second home at Academia Sinica was the (now dissolved) Sun Yat-Sen Institute for Social Sciences and Philosophy, where I had the good fortune to work with many wonderful people, namely Chu Wan-Wen, Leung Ki-Che A., Yang Wen-Shan, Chen Shin-Min, and especially Liu Kung-Chung, who was my legal counsel, fellow wine enthusiast, and close confidant. The fabulous language teachers at National Taiwan University's Inter-University Program also enriched my experience of Taiwan, and I wish in particular to acknowledge Wu Hsin-Yi and Fan Mei-Yuan. Heart-felt gratitude also goes to my landlord and dear friend Mico Chen, who gave me an ideal "island of security" in the field, who was always there for me when I needed help, and whose wisdom and wit were a breath of fresh air even during the most stifling times. Most of all, I am deeply indebted to my "informant-friends," who graciously embraced me within their much misunderstood friendship lifeworld and allowed me access to the cultural intimacies that make Taiwan such a very special place.

Mom and Dad somehow remained patient and supportive throughout these seemingly interminable graduate student years. I am forever grateful to them for keeping the faith. I regret that Grandma and Tado did not live to see me graduate. Tado was my truest friend, and what I learned about trust and friendship from him was the most valuable life training I have ever received. In all that I do, he remains with me in spirit. Above all, I am indebted in more ways than I can say to Haiyan Lee, who has given me a ceaseless combination of illumination, discipline, and joy, without which the completion of this dissertation would not have been possible. I dedicate this dissertation to the memory of Tado and to Haiyan.
