EDITORIAL.

The most natural diversion to which one turns during pleasant weather at Cornell is "picnicing". Conditions here are almost ideal for this form of diversion, and for people who have lived in cities, it is never tiresome. There is one thing however, which should be considered at this time, and that is the wasting of food. With more careful planning, the buying and carrying of surplus food could be avoided. And if anything worth while should be left over, even though an inconvenience, it should be carried home and put to some use. The extra half pound of bacon or butter could be used in any household. This is one way in which our American extravagance can be checked. It is a small saving, but still a saving. Besides it is pleasanter for the next picnicker who wants to use the same place for his good time.
