OBIITURY.

Died, in this city, on the 4th instant, Mrs. Abigail Louise Smith, wife of Alexander B. Johnson, Esq., aged 37.

The pan of eulogy could not be more appropriately employed, than in enlarging upon the virtues of this excellent woman, who has been severed from her friends and society at an age which gave promise of many succeeding years of usefulness and happiness. Surrounded by a numerous and interesting family, and warmly beloved no less in the social than in the domestic circle, her untimely decease has caused a vacancy in both, which both may seek in vain to fill.

The genuine female virtues ever court seclusion, and it seems almost a violation of propriety to touch upon them publicly, even by way of deserved eulogy upon the departed. Exercised as they are in the privacy of domestic, and in the courtesies of social life, without noise or ostentation, their most fitting praise is in the quiet and lasting remembrance of connexions and friends. So long as unobtrusive charity and ready benevolence are esteemed as ornaments of the female character, the memory of Mrs. Johnson will be cherished with affection; for many are the destitute and afflicted whom her bounty has relieved and her kindness made happy. So long as the sacred and trying duties of the wife and the mother are duly appreciated, she will be thought of with tears by those who best know how inimitably well she performed them. So long as the courtesies of life are cherished, her amiability and grace in rendering those courtesies, will embalm her name in the remembrance of her numerous friends and acquaintances. So long as the faithful and unostentatious discharge of the Christian duties is held up as a theme for praise and a pattern for imitation, the exemplary manner in which she fulfilled those various duties, whether they required her to act or to suffer, will shed a soothing charm upon her memory, which will only fade when that is effaced. Had her life been measured by her virtues, and the termination of it left to the disposal of those who knew her, many are the years that would have been added to it, could they have been crowned with happiness to herself. But a better and a wiser than any human friend has otherwise ordained her destiny, giving new and impressive force to the lesson, that 'in the midst of life we are in death.' All that now remains is her example, which may be highly commended with sincerity and imitated with profit.

COMMUN COUNCIL PROCEED.

DIED.

On Sunday evening 3d inst., of consumption, Deborah B. wife of John A. Wilson, at Utica, on the 4th instant, Abigail Louise Smith Johnson, aged 36 years, wife of A. B. Johnson, grand daughter of the late President John Adams, and niece of ex-President John Quincy Adams.

This amiable woman will long be remembered by a numerous circle of friends. Her beauty, accomplishments, and virtues made her an ornament of society, and it is an inestimable dispensation of Providence which has thus cut down the enjoyment of youth, fortune and universal esteem, one of the loveliest and most amiable of her sex.
