
CONTRIBUTORS

Sulfikar Amir is an assistant professor in the Division of Sociology, Nanyang Technological University, Singapore. His research interests primarily focus on the intersection between the politics of technology, the state, and nationalism.

Siddharth Chandra is director of the Asian Studies Center and professor of economics at Michigan State University's James Madison College.

Elizabeth Fuller Collins is a professor in the Department of Classics and World Religions and the Program in Southeast Asian Studies at Ohio University. Her most recent book is Indonesia Betrayed: How Development Fails (University of Hawai'i Press, 2007).

Greg Fealy is a fellow and senior lecturer in Indonesian politics at the College of Asia and the Pacific, The Australian National University, in Canberra. His previous publications include Ijtihad Politik Ulama: Sejarah NU, 1952–1967; Joining the Caravan: The Middle East, Islamism, and Indonesia (co-authored); and Zealous Democrats: Islamism in Egypt, Turkey, and Indonesia (co-authored). He is currently chief investigator for a three-year research project on terrorism in Indonesia.

Professor Howard Federspiel, semi-retired, is teaching courses at Ohio State (Islamic political philosophy) and Ohio University (Southeast Asian politics and Politics of the Underdeveloped World). His publications include Sultan, Shamans, and Saints: Islam and Muslims in Southeast Asia (University of Hawai'i Press, 2007).

The Reverend Professor James Haire is executive director of the Australian Centre for Christianity and Culture (National Australian Christian Centre), professor of theology at Charles Sturt University, and director of the Public and Contextual Theology Research Centre, all based in Canberra, Australia.

Vannessa Hearman is a doctoral candidate in the School of Historical Studies at the University of Melbourne. She is writing a thesis on the killings of and political repression against members and sympathizers of the Indonesian Communist Party in East Java (1965–68). She is a holder of the University of Melbourne's Human Rights Scholarship, which recognizes the recipient's past and potential contribution to human-rights work through academic and other endeavors.

Katharine McGregor is a Senior Lecturer in Southeast Asian History at the University of Melbourne. She is currently working on a project, funded by the Australian Research Council, on "Islam and the Politics of Memory in Post-Authoritarian Indonesia," and on an edited book, together with Douglas Kammen, that studies the 1965 Indonesian killings. She has published History in Uniform: Military Ideology and the Construction of the Indonesian History in 2007 (National University of Singapore Press).

Jemma Purdey is an Australian Research Council postdoctoral fellow in the Centre of Southeast Asian Studies and School of Political and Social Inquiry, Monash University. She is author of Anti-Chinese Violence in Indonesia, 1996–1999 (University of Hawai'i Press, 2006) and is writing a biography of Herbert "Herb" Feith.

Sai Siew Min is Assistant Professor at the History Department in the National University of Singapore, where she teaches Southeast Asian and gender histories. Her main research interests revolve around the Chinese and Chineseness in Southeast Asia, particularly Indonesia, Singapore, and Malaysia. She has published work on the Chinese in Singapore and Indonesia. This article is part of an ongoing book project on reconceptualizing the history of the Chinese in Indonesia.

Quinton Temby is a PhD candidate in the Department of Political and Social Change at the Australian National University. He has reported from East Timor for Radio Australia and Deutsche Welle Radio. He is currently researching the history of radical Islam in Indonesia.

Kimberly Twarog is a doctoral candidate in the department of women's studies at UCLA. Her dissertation, "Traditions in the Making: Performance, Identity, and Healing in Acehnese Communities," examines the significance of traditional dance, music, and theater practices for Acehnese survivors of the 1976–2005 separatist conflict and the 2004 Indian Ocean tsunami.

Michael Wood is a faculty member in the department of humanities, Dawson College, Montreal, and is also currently teaching in McGill University's department of political science. He is the author of Official History in Modern Indonesia: New Order Perceptions and Counterinterviews (E. J. Brill, 2005) and several articles on nationalism and Islam in modern Indonesia.